

Building Integrity: The Power of Trust in Integrated Construction

Written by Owen Matson
Ace Ready Mix General Manager

In a large, integrated construction company, honesty and trust are the ultimate framework holding complex operations together. Operating with in-house design engineering, supply and field teams means every department is interconnected. A single breakdown in communication can trigger a domino effect of delays across the entire project pipeline.

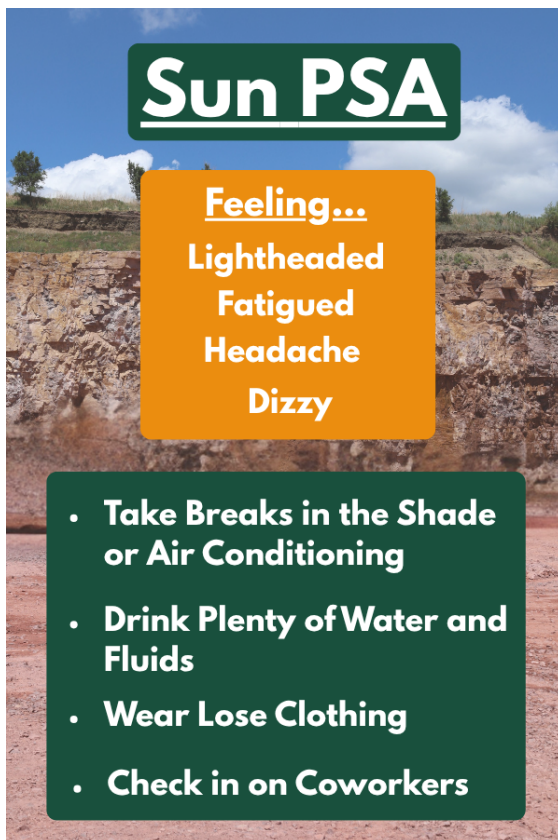

True integration thrives on radical transparency. When estimators, project managers, and field crews practice absolute honesty, the company mitigates risk instantly. Subcontractors and internal divisions can report supply shortfalls or design clashes without fear of blame. This open communication allows for immediate, cross-functional problem solving before minor field errors escalate into multimillion-dollar liabilities.

Furthermore, internal trust accelerates project delivery. Eliminating siloed communication stops departmental finger-pointing and streamlines scheduling. Accurate data sharing across divisions ensures that procurement aligns perfectly with field production, protecting corporate margins and maximizing resource efficiency.

Ultimately, a unified culture of integrity strengthens the company's brand reputation with institutional clients. When an integrated firm delivers on its word internally, it projects unmatched reliability externally. Honesty is the blueprint that transforms corporate synergy into operational excellence.

The People Behind Delivering Solutions

Friendship is a big part of what makes coming to work enjoyable, especially for John Doese and Troy Jensen.

“The best part of working for Myrl & Roy’s and L. G. Everist is that it’s one big family,” Doese said.

Pointing to Doese, Jensen laughed, “I talk to this guy more than anyone outside of work.” The friendships they’ve built over Doese’s 23 years and Jensen’s 32 years with the company are reflected in the quality of their work.

“I take pride in knowing that when the city, county, or the state needs something, we’re usually the first ones they call,” Jensen said.

Safety is another reason both men enjoy coming to work. “It makes me want to come back every day because I know I don’t have to worry about my safety,” Doese said. Their dedication to their crew, and their commitment to safety, and the pride they take in their work make them just a few examples of The People Behind Delivering Solutions.
